Hello Charlie,

I am writing because our records indicate that your account has integrated at least one of your Zendesk instances with one or more deployments from our developer partner, Intercom / Fin, whom Zendesk has made the decision to stop partnering with going forward.

This will not impact your existing integrations. Customers looking to create new integrations, starting today, will not be able to do so. Because you have an existing integration, you may obtain an exemption upon request if ever you need to install a new instance.

This was a difficult decision to make, but as we described over email earlier this year, and as we have written in the following articles on our Zendesk blog, we are in the process of reevaluating our developer ecosystem to prioritize security and trust:

Elevating API security to keep pace with innovation

Building a more secure API ecosystem as AI accelerates

For your awareness, most developers in our ecosystem have either met these new standards or are not out of compliance with key requirements and will remain available as usual. In some cases, we temporarily disabled installation of a developer's integration because they have not yet completed work to come up to basic integration security standards, and once this work is completed, the relevant integration will come back into availability.

In other, very rare cases unrelated to these security standards, where Zendesk worked directly with the developer to change behavior and the developer declined Zendesk's requests, or we otherwise lost trust in the partnership, we are declining to allow that developer to regain access to our ecosystem. This is the case here and why we are notifying you for this specific integration.

However, as described above, we are taking steps to ensure current customers' ongoing operations are not disrupted or impacted. Putting customers first is our number one priority during this transition.

If you have any issues – for example, if you experience any unexpected disruption with your integrations, you can reach out to our support team. We are here to help.

Thank you for your continued partnership and trust.

Thank you,
Colin Murphy
